A target for tetranitromethane. The initial step in superoxide scavenging by Cu,Zn superoxide dismutase (SOD) is its reaction with superoxide anion radicals to form a Cu,Zn-superoxide radical complex, which reacts with oxygen in a bimolecular mechanism resulting in detoxification of the superoxide. The kinetics of this reaction have been measured for the first time. It is apparent that rate constants for superoxide dismutation with Fe, Cu,Zn-SOD are about 25-fold faster than with Mn, Cu,Zn-SOD. In the case of the non-Zn containing Cu,Zn-SOD from E. coli, the rate of reaction with O2- is $3.4 \times 10(9)$ M-1 s-1 at 37 degrees C, the first order rate constant for superoxide interaction is $4.9 \times 10(9)$ M-1 s-1 at 37 degrees C and the rate of superoxide binding is $1.3 \times 10(9)$ M-1 s-1 at 37 degrees C. The reaction with O2- is completed in 25 micros at 37 degrees C. Kinetic data obtained with the non-zinc containing Cu,Zn-SOD from E. coli show that nitrosylating reagents react with this enzyme to form a protein product, which is reactive with tetranitromethane to yield an end product. This protein product can be shown by two-dimensional polyacrylamide gel electrophores
