Over the course of the offseason, we will be previewing the strengths and weaknesses of the 49ers in several key areas, including quarterback, defense, and special teams. Today we take a look at the team's strength and weaknesses on special teams. The theme of the offseason has been how much the 49ers believe in the return game. Not that they needed much convincing given how well Colin Kaepernick has performed on the ground. But the reason Kaepernick is a perennial favorite for the league MVP is he can play at a top level on the ground and his mobility in the air. This also means the return game is a vital cog in San Francisco's offense. It has been crucial in allowing the offense to go to the air, and for that reason it is likely the issue fans and critics of the team will argue most in 2013. Here are the top three things San Francisco needs to be more proficient on: 1. Addition of Eddie Royal Most people believe there is no way the 49ers could have been worse in punt return last year than they were in 2012. But one of the reasons that was so bad was because they were way too conservative with the ball. San Francisco averaged minus-0.96 yards a return, which was a 23rd-place mark in the NFL and ranked dead last in the league among 2013 returning teams. It put them in the same category as teams like the Bills, Browns, Cowboys, and Jaguars. The reasoning for the conservative approach was that they placed little faith in a group of kick returners and punt returners that was loaded with inexperienced players.
